Climate Change Politics and the Future of Capitalism

Lecture by Jeffrey Broadbent

Wednesday, December 3, 2014
4 p.m., Room A 300

The intensification of climate change and its accompanying geophysical and social disasters pose enormous future risks for the human species. Societies around the world have already exhibited significant differences in their recognition of these risks and in their efforts to cut emissions. The international research project on Comparing Climate Change Policy Networks, with cooperating research teams in 17 countries, studies the causes of this cross-national variation in degree of risk recognition and in consequent intentional policy-driven emission cuts.

This talk presents preliminary findings from the project that start to identify causal factors associated with different national emissions trajectories. Strong popular support for parties and governments that favor incentives such as carbon taxes to steer capitalist and consumer behavior toward sustainable energy appears key to the solution on the national level. But at the global level, the commitment of the United States to this type of regime, which remains unlikely, appears crucial for getting a wider range of countries, especially the big developing countries, to cooperate in an effective global effort. Change in US national climate change policies will depend upon increased public recognition of the anthropogenic nature of the problem, a longer term responsibility for outcomes, and a greater awareness of the necessity of global collective response.
